Pedophilic disorder is characterized by recurring, intense sexually arousing fantasies, urges, or behavior involving children (usually 13 years old or younger). In some undeveloped countries, a lot of sensitizations hasn't been done yet to defend pedophilia as a maladaptive condition and even give room for treatment of pedophiles. In most cases, some get to escape justice due to their Influence and wealth status hereby giving room for future occurrences and neglecting treatment and therapies. In Nigeria, Kaduna State to be precise, the governor issued a law that would have pedophiles castrated as their punishment but The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC), an independent Nigerian body, however, expressed concern that the law flouts the country's 2017 Anti-Torture Act. That act outlaws "mutilation such as amputation of essential parts of the body such as the genitalia, ears or tongue and any other part of the body. Justice on pedophiles have become the only recommendation to erase pedophilia from the society although not every victim is lucky to be vindicated and not many victims are courageous to speak up hereby the Culprits go unpunished and, in some cases, accept it has their way of life. In the psychology world, this can be treated and managed but the anger and rage from the society gives little room for that and the fear for justice has led to a lot of quietness among victims who are mostly young children due to threats and other society discomforts while the evil eats up the society quietly. 80% of pedophilia cases are recorded with statements of threats and warnings and in a lot of cases, culprits are mostly caught not on their first time. But is the society willing to accept the treatment of pedophilia as pedophiles can actually get opportunities to be treated and avoid future harms and victimisation.
